A SUBSTITUTE CHAPERON

By FANNY KENDERDINE.

(Copyright, 1915, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

A bellboy had just brought the telegram to Mrs. Ramsey. She regarded it with vexed resignation.

"Girls," she said, addressing her pretty daughters, "you must go home with me. Mrs. Kittredge wires me that she will be in Boston on the 20th—tomorrow—to make me the long-promised visit. I must be there to greet her." Her tone was final.

"But, mother," objected Katharine, "why can't you write Mrs. Kittredge and tell her to visit us here in New York? We can have heaps more fun."

"There is no reason why we should not remain until after the Beasley concert," began Rosalind, but the look on her mother's face checked her words.

"Unchaperoned?" asked Mrs. Ramsey, in horror.

"Find us a chaperon for the remainder of the week, and then we'll come home and help entertain Mrs. Kittredge," urged Katharine.

"There's no one in town of whom I would ask such a favor, but there is my cousin, Algernon Mudge—"

Algernon Mudge!

Visions of his portrait in an obscure corner of the library at home assailed the mental vision of the girls. Cousin Algernon Mudge was small and pale and very learned looking. His little moonlike face was almost obscured by a pair of huge tortoise-shell rimmed spectacles.

Surely one would be safe with Algernon Mudge, their mother's second cousin.

When they reached their sitting-room after their mother had gone, they were confronted by a servant bearing the card of Mr. Algernon Mudge.

All this for the benefit of a little near-sighted student!

"Come!" said Katharine, and they went down to the red parlor where the visitor awaited them.

But the only occupant of the red parlor was a tall, big-framed young man, smartly arrayed in most flockless clothes.

The young man bowed profoundly.

"I am here," he said pleasantly.

"You—you are mistaken," said Rosalind haughtily. "We are looking for our cousin, Mr. Mudge."

"I am Algernon Mudge," insisted the youth, placing a card on the table. "My father is laid up with an attack of rheumatic gout and he sent me—as a sort of substitute chaperon. I—hope you don't mind."

Katharine looked appealingly at her elder sister.

"We didn't know that Cousin Algernon had a son," confessed Rosalind. "We thought he was a childless widower. But we are glad to see you, Cousin Algernon; but we were surprised."

"No wonder," said Algernon, shaking hands vigorously. "Expecting a neat little chaperon like dad, and finding me!"

"I'm sorry, but I'm afraid you won't do," sighed Rosalind.

"Oh, bother!" said young Algernon. "Let me take you about a bit. How long have you been here?"

"Arrived last night," announced Rosalind, tragically.

"Say, that's bad luck, isn't it? Ever been here before?"

"No; we live in Boston, and it hasn't seemed—seemed necessary," went on Rosalind. "But now we are here there are so many things we wanted to see; just common everyday 'sights' that you will laugh at."

The girls went away with Algernon Mudge and from the moment they mounted to the roof of a Fifth Avenue bus until hours afterward they were set down at the Mudge home in Washington square, they forgot everything save that they were seeing things about which they had read and talked for years.

And Algernon Mudge, senior, sort of balanced matters by proving to be exactly as they had pictured him—save that he was the most charming and delightful of hosts.

"I didn't want to disappoint you, mother, my dear," he said patting their hands; "so I just sent my big boy along. Algie works too hard anyway. A little play will do no harm."

After dinner Jack Kenyon, a friend of Algie, dropped in and Cousin Algernon insisted upon music. And the next day there were four who set forth upon adventure in Manhattan.

It was a double wedding the following October.

After Katharine and Algie and Rosalind and Jack had left the house, Mrs. Ramsey looked at Cousin Algernon Mudge, who beamed back at her through his goggles.

"I—I'm afraid you're an irresponsible chaperon," sighed Mrs. Ramsey. "Through you I've lost both my girls!"

Cousin Algernon squeezed her hand gently.

"A reliable chaperon usually arranges a desirable marriage," he hinted, "and, remember, Sally, that I am alone, too—and, well—if we had met years ago we would have been sweethearts. What do you think—eh?"

Mrs. Ramsey blushed.

"I don't know, Cousin Algernon—but they say—it's never too late—"

But Algernon Mudge did not wait for her to complete the sentence.
